GLOBAL GENDER EQUALITY CONSTITUTIONAL DATABASE BACKGROUND NOTES AND CODEBOOK

GOVERNANCE AND PARTICIPATION SECTION UN WOMEN

New York, March 2025

"This Constitutional Database is interesting and extremely useful to law makers, gender activists, constitutional, academic and other human rights interested individuals. I wish I had had this when we were drafting the Constitution of Rwanda. It would have been easier and more gender sensitive."

 The Honourable Tito Rutaremara, Senator and former chairperson of the 1994 Constitutional Review Commission, Republic of Rwanda

"The UN Women Constitutional Database is the most in-depth treatment of constitutional provisions on gender available. It is sure to provide a great resource for constitution-makers and national publics engaged in producing fundamental law, and to advance the cause of gender equality."

— Tom Ginsburg, Spitz Professor of Law, University of Chicago Law School

I. BASIC INFORMATION ABOUT CONSTITUTIONS AND THE DATABASE

A. Definition and description of constitutions

A country's constitution is the 'highest law of the land', setting out State operations, governance and accountability. Authorities and responsibilities are allocated and balanced between the executive, the legislature and the judiciary, and between national and sub-national jurisdictions. Modern constitutions also create extensive rights entitlements for individuals, by placing a wide range of demands and restrictions on the use of State power. There is no single template for the specific content of a constitution. Some are highly detailed with comprehensive descriptions of the institutions and offices of all branches of government, specific provisions describing the powers, rights and duties of political officers and citizens, and statements regarding national norms or values. Others contain 'minimal' standards by setting down only the basic structural rules for the functioning of institutions and the operation of government, while leaving the details of legal rights and duties to ordinary laws. Although the definition and protection of fundamental rights is a common function of constitutions, the degree to which this is done varies by constitution. It is not uncommon for countries with relatively few constitutional rights to reflect such commitments through legislation, which may be effectively entrenched or protected from repeal.

The identification of some constitutions can be straightforward because they exist as a written legal instrument or document expressly described as the 'constitution'. Others (e.g. Israel, New Zealand) identify with multiple instruments, which comprise their constitutional text. There are also those that are simply uncodified or 'unwritten', as in the case of the United Kingdom, whose constitution, by contrast to a single instrument, is an evolution of various statutes, conventions, judicial decisions and treaties. Furthermore, many of the world's countries are federations, and, as such, have sub-national constitutions for each of their separate federal regions, as well as national constitutions governing the whole country.

For all these reasons, key legislation and other quasiconstitutional instruments may need to be examined, to identify a country's 'constitution' and understand how it works.

B. Why constitutions are important for achieving gender equality

Given the power and importance of constitutions, their content and design can have a major impact on women's lives and opportunities-making them a critical target in the quest for gender equality. A welldesigned constitution may allow women to recognize and assert their rights, enjoy full and equal citizenship, participate in their country's political decision-making and have access to public roles and offices on an equal footing with men. A constitution may, alternatively, obstruct women's equality and agency, making it difficult for them to enjoy rights and freedoms. Constitutions must also be supplemented by other legal instruments and policies to ensure their efficacy. For example, how a constitution is interpreted by the courts is a critical factor in its actual operation: constitutions can do nothing of their own accord if the courts do not hold public and private persons and entities to account for constitutional violations.

Exploring whether a constitution includes or lacks gender equality commitments, therefore, offers an avenue for pursuing gender equality claims and in asserting women's full entitlements as subjects of rights. Under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW),

State Parties commit "to embody the principle of the equality of men and women in their national constitutions".¹ Engendering constitutional processes and content are therefore part of a State's international human rights obligations.

C. Criteria and methodology used in the design of the database

The database serves as an avenue for determining the degree to which constitutions reflect the provisions of CEDAW and other agreed international human rights instruments. The women's rights agenda is driven by CEDAW (see Appendix), which is premised on the International Bill of Rights (comprising the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights) and supplemented by the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action.²

Therefore, the nexus to the provisions of CEDAW and the recommendations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (the Committee) was the basic premise for the selection of the 24 categories and 19 sub-categories used in the mapping of constitutional provisions. Given that every single provision in a constitution impacts on gender relations, the criteria, sub-criteria and related provisions include those that have a direct gender equality nexus (i.e. those that make explicit reference to women, gender, sex or he/she pronouns) and those that contribute to the realization of women's rights, e.g. Constitutional Review Bodies and National Human Rights Bodies.

The provisions contained in the database were extracted manually, using key word searches and an analysis of constitutional provisions. Where criteria or sub-criteria attracted more than one constitutional provision, such provisions were arranged in consecutive order. To avoid over bloating of the database, only relevant parts of constitutional texts were used. For the same reason, the preferred clauses are those that relate to substantive rights rather than procedural rights.

Decisions related to the selection of provisions were informed by elaborate iterative discussions and an extensive and thorough quality assurance process involving four team members and external peer reviewers. Reliance on a network of translators from many parts of the world further contributed to the 'linguistic friendly' base of this product.

On completion of the data collection exercise, the team found significant compatibility between the extracted gender equality related constitutional provisions and the 2030 Agenda's Sustainable Development Goals³—affirming the potential influence of constitutions in development discourse and, more importantly, in the implementation of this development framework.

Having said this, the constitutional database does not promise to be exhaustive or comprehensive, nor does it seek to replace the constitutions themselves. Users are therefore encouraged to read the full text of constitutional provisions, including their translated versions, where useful or necessary.

The database is a product of extensive internal and external consultations, particularly with academics, government, Civil Society Organizations and UN constitutional focal points.⁴ The database continues to be revised based on constitutional amendments and revisions taking place all over the world. It is hoped that the database will benefit from partnerships, continued dialogue and expert support, with a view to regular updates to ensure continued relevance and utilization.
